I Don't Want to Go!
Children Who Resist Post-Separation Contact with a Parent

March 15

8:45 a.m. – 4:00 p.m.

Welcome: Sharon Smith, Chair, Board of Directors, AFCC (AB Chapter)

Children Who Resist Post-Separation Contact With a Parent

Mental health and legal and dispute resolution professionals are, with increasing frequency, dealing with highly complex cases involving children resisting contact with a parent. These cases are seen within and outside the courtroom and provide great challenges to the various professionals who work with the parents to seek resolution. This presentation will address the collaboration needed between lawyers, judges, and mental health professionals for effective child-focused legal responses and clinical interventions. Differentiation of the various parent-child contact problems will be discussed as well as interventions that are focused on the individual needs of each family.

Barbara Jo Fidler, PhD., Families Moving Forward, Toronto, ON

Dr. Fidler has worked with high conflict separating/divorcing families conducting assessments, professional consultations, expert testimony, mediation, arbitration, therapy and parenting coordination for over 30 years. She is a frequent presenter to the judiciary, family bar, mental health professionals and law and mediation students on high conflict families and related topics. She has published in the areas of separation/divorce, parenting plans and residential schedules, parent-child contact problems and parenting coordination.

Nicholas Bala, Faculty of Law, Queen's University, Kingston, ON

Nicholas (Nick) Bala is an internationally recognized expert on issues related to children, youth and families in the justice system, and teaches in that area as well as Contract Law. Prof. Bala's research focuses on issues related to parental separation including parental alienation and relocation; children in the family courts, including role of child's counsel and judicial interviewing of children; spousal abuse and its effects on children; young offenders; children in the criminal courts; and access to family justice. Much of his research work is interdisciplinary; he has undertaken many collaborative projects with psychologists, social workers, criminologists and health professionals to better understand the effects of involvement in the justice system on children, youth and families.
